PRESENTERS

Roxane K. Kaufmann, MA, is the Director of Early Childhood Policy for Georgetown University Center for Child and Human Development. During the past twenty-five years, Ms. Kaufmann has been a strong advocate for the development of integrated services and systems for young children and their families. As part of the National Technical Assistance Center for Children's Mental Health, she plays a leadership role in supporting the work of states and communities in developing early childhood mental health systems of care through the facilitation of strategic planning, targeted technical assistance, and the development of materials. She has coordinated projects providing technical assistance to Head Start, child care, mental health, education, public health and special education. Ms. Kaufmann has written manuscripts, articles and training materials on early intervention in the context of system development. In addition, she provides training and technical assistance to twenty-eight countries from Eastern Europe and Central Asia in support of their education reform efforts.

Kathy Seitzinger Hepburn, MS, has worked with and on behalf of children and families throughout her career. Her work has focused on early childhood, young children, and their families in settings that include mental health services, specialty health care, and early education. Following years of direct clinical work and support services to children and families, she became Project Coordinator for Health and Mental Health Services for the Region III Head Start Resource and Training Center (HSQIC) at the University of Maryland University College. In this capacity, she provided extensive training and technical assistance to the Head Start and early childhood community. Currently, Ms. Hepburn is on faculty at the Georgetown University Center for Child and Human Development and works from her home office in Carlsbad, California. At Georgetown, she has been involved in multiple projects - local, state, and national - that support the early childhood and mental health services communities. In her work at Georgetown, she has provided technical assistance to Starting Early Starting Smart grantees integrating early childhood mental health services into community settings, authored publications related to early childhood and mental health policy and service systems, and facilitated state-level, strategic planning for early childhood mental health initiatives. Ms. Hepburn is also a Certified Local Program Mentor for the Devereux Foundation's Early Childhood Initiative and their Devereux Early Childhood Assessment (DECA).

WHY WE HOPE TO SEE YOU THERE

1. Early childhood mental health matters to us all.
2. Increasing numbers of young children with social-emotional and behavioral concerns are entering our systems.
3. Learning more about early childhood mental health and strengthening partnerships across systems will promote social-emotional health for all of Michigan's infants, toddlers and preschoolers.
